FACULTY

Megan-Brette Hamilton, PhD, CCC-SLP, is an assistant professor at Auburn University, where she teaches courses on communication disorders in society, child and adolescent language disorders, and clinical problem-solving for school-age populations. Prior to academia, Hamilton worked as an SLP for 10 years in Brooklyn, New York, where the majority of her caseload consisted of African American and Hispanic/Latinx children. During this time, she worked in 15 different schools with students from preschool to 21 years of age, working extensively with teachers, parents, and other professionals in a team-based approach. Her research focuses on the classroom and clinical experiences of speakers of nonmainstream dialects of English, with and without language disorders, with a particular focus on children who speak African American English. She is especially interested in teacher-student communication interactions, learning style differences, the role of paralinguistics, and the acquisition of Mainstream American English literacy. Hamilton’s work also focuses on the cultural-linguistic competence and perspectives of professionals and students working with culturally and linguistically diverse communities. She hosts the Honeybee Connection Podcast by MB, where one-on-one conversations explore the role of identity, language, and culture in communication.

Financial Disclosures
- Financial compensation from ASHA for this presentation

Nonfinancial Disclosures
- None